

You should check that your download specification is set for the number of connections it's possible for your connection to make(This is an option in almost every client's settings). If your download speed is very low, this may be the reason. In our experience, torrents download at a fraction of the internet average speed. So, you can see how a download spec of 500 torrents will download at roughly 7.8KB/s(300KB/s maximum), and a download spec of 2000 torrents will download at a bit higher speed of 23KB/s(910KB/s maximum). This is far less than the internet standard download speed of 56.6KB/s(2700KB/s maximum). The average BT client connects to around 10 peers, which is why torrents are usually downloaded at more than the 7.8KB/s shown above. In any case, if you're having a problem with your download, try changing your download specification to a lower setting and restart the download after each change. Your video quality could be reduced when you set the "keep" value to "0". The amount of data remaining is reduced by the size of the piece you're downloading. Finally, the quality setting applies to the entire torrent file and will not allow the piece you're downloading to have different qualities. Since you're connecting directly to other users in order to download your torrent, you can see the IP address of every user in the swarm and they can see yours. That IP is traceable to you, allowing anyone who joins the swarm to see what you're downloading. Some ISPs, particularly those outside the US, may also throttle your speeds if they see you're using BitTorrent. In order to prevent both of these issues, you should use a trustworthy VPN whenever torrenting. It'll obscure your IP address from the swarm and encrypt your traffic so that your wasted downloading that file, and all of those seconds add up. this is a problem for organizations like the recording industry association of america(riaa), who have made a practice of suing people when they're accused of downloading music illegally. typically, these lawsuits will usually bankrupt a target, or land them a fine more than the gross worth of their car. occasionally, if bittorrent were set up properly, you can effectively retrieve all pieces of the content at once. software like the openconnect vpn client can make connections to several services at once, including local bittorrent peers, allowing you to download the pieces of a huge file all at once. a proxy can be used to make connections to all the seeders at once, allowing you to download all the pieces of a large file in one fell swoop. unfortunately, that's a daunting task for most users. a proxy service is also susceptible to having your data seized, which is why so many vpn services will make you re-enter your username and password before connecting to the service. bittorrent is more effective if you're getting pieces of a single file, or several files, from a number of different people.
